FOREWORD TO THE AMERICAN EDITION

With books no longer coming from the Far East, the need for Chinese dictionaries in this country has grown from chronic to acute. To answer the immediate demands of American students, the Harvard-Yenching Institute has undertaken to revise and reprint two practical dictionaries, (1) C. H. Fenn's Pocket Dictionary, which appeared in November, 1942, and (2) the present Chinese-English Dictionary by R. H. Mathews, both photolithographic reproductions.

Within the necessary limitations of a photographic edition, and as far as interstices of the original edition allow, errors have been corrected, pronunciations and definitions revised, and new entries inserted, — in all amounting to some 15,000 items. A whole Introduction on Pronunciation has been added, and a list of the syllabic headings is included for quick reference, since the original order of syllables is not strictly alphabetic. An additional feature of the new edition is that all cases of the neutral, i.e., unstressed, tone are indicated. There has been a reduction in size from 8 x 11 to 7 x 10 inches to make the volume handier without at the same time sacrificing legibility.

Mr. M. Y. Wang is responsible for the mechanical details of preparing the book for reproduction, Dr. Y. R. Chao has written the Introduction and has checked the pronunciation of all the entries, and both have taken part in the revisions.

PREFACE TO THE FIRST EDITION

Baller's Analytical Chinese-English Dictionary, now out of print, was first published in 1900. It has served a useful purpose and many students of Chinese acknowledge their indebtedness to it, but the rapid changes which have taken place in China, with the influx of modern inventions and the advance of scientific knowledge, have brought in a wealth of new ideas, necessitating a corresponding number of new expressions. These things have made the old dictionary out of date, and mere revision would have been inadequate. Therefore instead of revising the old book, a new dictionary has been compiled, keeping in view the object of the original work: "to supply the demand for a dictionary at once portable and inexpensive and at the same time sufficiently large to meet the wants of an ordinary student."

The number of Chinese characters included in the book has been increased to 7,785, not including different forms of the same character. This selection of characters should meet the needs of the average student, as most of the characters which have been added were not found in the founts of the Press and had to be specially engraved. The use of the characters has been illustrated by a greatly increased number of examples. In Baller's Dictionary there were about 40,000, while the present book gives over 104,000 illustrations drawn from the classics, general literature, magazines, newspapers, advertisements, legal documents, and many other sources. As far as possible, every use of a character has been illustrated by examples. Some of these expressions may have passed out of current use, but their inclusion in a dictionary is warranted by the fact that they occur in the literature of the period.

A departure has been made from the practice of beginning all phrases and sentences used in illustration with the character under which they appear. It is obvious that many characters, such for example as the final particles, could not be illustrated by this method. A better idea of the use of a character can be gained when sentences are also given in which it appears elsewhere than at the beginning of the phrase used. Some of the sentences have been duplicated, but this is no disadvantage if it affords any assistance to a better knowledge of the use of a character. From time to time examples were found after the earlier part of the book was in the press, necessitating their insertion under one of the other characters in the phrase. In a "rush job" such things are unavoidable, the urgent demand for the publication of the dictionary making it compulsory to go to press long before the compilation was completed.

In preparing this dictionary the question of keeping it down to as small a compass as possible had to be constantly borne in mind. Considerations of space, in view of the demand for a largely increased number of illustrative examples, made it advisable to omit details regarding the construction of Chinese characters. This also led to the omission of the Analytical References, inquiry showing that comparatively little use had been made of them. The etymology of Chinese characters is now being given scientific study, and special books dealing with the subject have been published. Those who desire to study the combinations of Radical and Phonetic will find Soothill's Pocket Dictionary invaluable.

The characters have been arranged in groups according to the classification of the Chinese Alphabet, usually known as the Chinese Phonetic Script, 注音字母, as used in the Phonetic Dictionary of the Chinese National Language. (國語正音字典. Commercial Press, Ltd., Shanghai.[1])

The sounds are given both in the Chinese Alphabet and in Romanized spelling. The system of Romanization followed is the slightly modified adaptation of Wade's Syllabary used in the National Language Dictionary and other useful publications of the Commercial Press. This is, at present, the most widely recognized system being used by the foreign press, the Chinese Post Office, and others. The Chinese government has given this question of Romanized spelling some consideration, and a society to investigate the matter has recently been formed, but the system evolved by the government is still in a more or less tentative form and has not come into general use. The object of that system is to give, as far as is possible, a rendering in Roman letters which will obviate the use of figures or other marks to indicate the different tones, so that a reader would be able to give a fairly accurate rendering of the Chinese sounds without a knowledge of the characters. In the meantime we have used the system which is well known and which has proved its usefulness. Where Wade's system differs from that used in the old dictionary, the latter is given in smaller type and is placed in brackets.

The Phonetic system being one of combining initials and finals, the Romanized combinations hs, sh, ts, or tz, are regarded as initials and follow the groups under h, s, and t, respectively, e.g., huo, hsi; szŭ, sha; t'ung, tsa, etc.

The tones are indicated by a figure at the right-hand top corner of the characters.

1 representing the 上平聲
2 representing the 下平聲
3 representing the 上 聲
4 representing the 去 聲
5 representing the 入 聲

The characters under the Fifth Tone or 入聲 will be found in a separate group immediately following the group in the other tones. The characters in this group are also marked with the alternative tone heard in Peking and other places where the Fifth Tone is not used.

Instead of giving a wealth of information in the definition at the head of the illustrative examples. often bewildering the student with apparently unrelated meanings, the definitions of the characters, where possible or necessary, have been divided into separate groups, beginning with the meanings most commonly given to the characters and going on to those under other sounds or tones, or to those more obscure definitions only found in the classics or ancient books. These groups are indicated by alphabetical reference marks in brackets, the initial group having no particular reference, while each subsequent group is marked (a) (b) (c), etc. Each of these definitions is copiously illustrated by examples, which for facility of reference have been arranged according to the sequence of the radical of the second character in the sentence or phrase. This arrangement saves considerable time when searching for any particular phrase in a long list of examples. Moreover, if one does not find that particular phrase in its place in the list according to the radical of its second character there is no need to waste any more time in looking up and down the column for it. The phrases that begin with the character under which they are placed are first dealt with, those beginning with other characters follow in the order of the radicals of their initial characters. These illustrative examples have been numbered by placing a small figure to the left of the column, thus enabling a person to turn at once to any sentence to which he may be referred from another part of the book. The number of these cross-references would have been greater but for the fact that the urgency of the demand made it compulsory to go to press before the compilation of the manuscript was completed.

A new method has been used in compiling the Radical Index. Much time is often wasted in searching up and down the columns of these indexes and any arrangement which tends to obviate this should be welcomed. The characters have been arranged in the usual way under their respective radicals and grouped according to the number of strokes in the phonetic or primitive, i.e., that part of a character which is not the radical, but instead of placing these characters in the usual haphazard way, they have been carefully arranged according to the sequence of the radicals of their phonetics. These radicals, though sometimes obscure, are usually obvious. A glance at the Radical Index will show what is meant, and practical experience in the use of this Index during the compilation of the dictionary has proved its value. If a character is not found where it should be according to the radical of its phonetic, it is not in the dictionary, and there is no need to waste time in looking up and down a long list for it.

The suggestions and requests which were received have been rather bewildering. "Many more characters must be added, as well as many more illustrative examples, but the book should be very much smaller than the old one, and also very much lighter." It reminds us of the old lady who is said to have asked the Bible Society if they could supply her with a pocket edition of the Scriptures in large type. The question was frequently asked, "Are you including all the new terms?" People seem to have an idea that there is a nice treasure-house somewhere in which all these terms are arranged ready for the use of a poor compiler. Alas, there is no such place. These terms have to be hunted for through hundreds of pages of the newspapers, magazines, and other literature. He would be a bold man indeed who would assert that he had ascertained all the new terms. In fact, many of these expressions which are called new by those who meet them for the first time are hoary with age. However, every effort has been made to introduce the latest expressions, and the inclusion of terms relating to motors, electricity, aviation, wireless, and similar things has brought the book up to date.

Only such scientific terms as are commonly met with have been included. The lists are by no means complete, the intention being merely to give illustrations of the way in which characters are combined to express such ideas. Those who desire fuller information are referred to text-books or special dictionaries of scientific terms.

The rapid changes in official circles have made many of the official titles and designations obsolete, as far as being usable in current speech is concerned, but this is inevitable, changes coming so rapidly that before a thing is in print, a new set of titles has been evolved. It is quite true, as one has said, that a dictionary is the graveyard of a language. Everything political is at present in a state of flux and these titles are simply translated without any authoritative statement as to their currency in speech.

The book is now sent forth in the hope that it will contribute something to lighten the task of learning this great language and that by its use students will become more proficient in translating and speaking Chinese.

INTRODUCTION ON PRONUNCIATION

1. Romanization and Standards of Pronunciation. — Three systems of pronunciation are represented in this dictionary. Take for example the syllabic heading on p. 431, col. 2. The form HSÜAN represents the Peiping pronunciation in the Wade system. The form SÜAN, as well as the three National Phonetic Letters in parentheses to the right, represents the standard National Pronunciation as embodied in the official book Kuo-yin Tzŭ-tien (國音字典), Shanghai, 1920. Finally, the form Hsüen in parentheses represents another system of pronunciation, in some respects similar to, but not identical with, the National Pronunciation of 1920 in the romanization used by the China Inland Mission. Of these forms, the second became obsolete only one year after the first publication of this dictionary, when a new standard of National Pronunciation was adopted. The official dictionary now in force, which has superseded Kuo-yin Tzŭ-tien, is Gwoin Charngyonq Tzyhhuey (國音常用字彙), Shanghai, 1932, of which a more accessible form is found in an appendix to the dictionary Tz'ŭ-hai (辭海), Shanghai, 1937. Besides giving the pronunciation in the National Phonetic Letters, the Gwoin Charngyonq Tzyhhuey, as the romanized title indicates, also employs a new system of romanization called Gwoyeu Romatzyh or National Romanization, of which the most easily available forms in this country are The Chinese Sentence Series and The New Official Chinese Latin Script Gwoyeu Romatzyh, both by W. Simon, London, 1942. Since the system corresponds, syllable by syllable, to the Wade system, and represents much the same dialect, we need not introduce it in the body of this dictionary.

While the old National Pronunciation was an eclectic system, closely resembling that of the original 1874 edition of S. W. Williams' Syllabic Dictionary, the new standard is practically a straightforward adoption of the pronunciation of Peiping. There are some unimportant differences of detail such as the treating of both cho and shuo as containing the final -uo (see note a, Section 6 below) and the assigning to the second tone of more cases of words from ancient b', d', g', z, etc. ending in -p, -t, -k[1] than is actually common in Peiping, e.g. chi^{2} 寂 instead of the more current chi^{4}<dz'iek. But on the whole the present National Pronunciation is simply the pronunciation of the Peiping dialect.

2. Modifications in the Wade System. — In the preface to the first edition, reference was made to the use of a "slightly modified adaptation of Wade's Syllabary," i.e., modified to agree with the National Pronunciation of 1920. Now that the standard has come back to the pronunciation of Peiping, we can almost use the unmodified Wade's Syllabary or the more widely used Wade-Giles system, as found in H. A. Giles' Chinese-English Dictionary. However, a few points of simplification of the Wade-Giles system to agree with the dialect of Peiping should be noted. The four forms chio, ch'io, hsio, and yo in Giles' Dictionary are obsolete and have been combined with chüeh, ch'üeh, hsüeh, and yüeh respectively in this revised edition. The assignment of some characters to the syllable i and others to yi has no phonetic or etymological basis whatever and both have been put under the syllable i in this dictionary since the first edition. For the finals o and ê, the present edition follows Giles. In Chauncey Goodrich's Pocket Dictionary, the syllables ko, k'o, ho, and o of Wade-Giles are given as kê, k'ê, hê, and ê. While this is phonetically more accurate, it is phonemically not necessary, as one can understand that o is always unrounded in such positions, contrasting with the rounded o in kuo, k'uo, huo, and wo. In any case, we can follow the Wade-Giles usage without incurring ambiguity. (Cf. note c, Section 6 below.)

3. Order of Entries. — Owing to the complexity of the triple standard of pronunciation recorded in this dictionary, some syllables which are identical according to the new standard and consequently also identical in the Wade system are divided among several headings and often widely separated in the book. Thus the syllable chieh (according to the present standard) is found on p. 83, col. II as CHIAI (街); on p. 103, col. II as CHIEH or TSIEH (嗟); on p. 104, col. II as CHIEH (莢); and on p. 107, col. I as CHIEH or TSIEH (浹). It is obviously out of the question in this reproduced edition to reshuffle the entries. Besides, when the chieh's and tsieh's are in separate groups, it may be of convenience if one has occasion to refer to the French systems of romanization, since the latter maintain such etymological distinctions. We have therefore left all the headings as they are and have made cross references to other groups with the same pronunciation if they are not contiguous. It must be understood, however, that only the very first romanization in each heading is the Wade romanization and represents the present pronunciation. Changes in the headings have been made only to conform to this rule, as for example the original heading "CHIAI," p. 103, col. II, which has been changed to read "CHIEH. CHIAI." The second heading chiai represents the old National Pronunciation as given also in National Phonetic Letters in parentheses.

[1] In Chinese idiom, this law or tendency is described as 全濁上聲變陽平 'the entering tone of voiced stops and fricatives becomes the second tone.'

The words "Read" and "Pronounce" are used synonymously, the latter being used only in revised items. When an additional pronunciation is given (indicated by the abbreviation "Pron." and put after the definitions of a single character), this pronunciation is to supersede that of the syllabic heading under which the character occurs. For example, the character No. 5933 under SHUN was marked "Also read ch'un^{2}." Since ch'un^{2} is the only pronunciation current now, it is changed to read "Pron. ch'un^{2}," from which the reader is expected to disregard the main heading SHUN. As a cross reference, the character is added on p. 212, col. III as No. 1497½, and its definition is referred to No. 5933.

4. Levels of Pronunciation. — All languages or dialects have different levels or styles of pronunciation, and even if we take as standard the speech of the average educated person born in Peiping, as has been done in the case of the new National Pronunciation, there are still variations of pronunciation according to mood, speed, and context. Since the point of view of the user of this dictionary is more likely to be that of the reader of a text in characters rather than that of a listener to spoken words or of a student of linguistics, we have to take the character as the unit and treat liao^{3} and the neutral-toned ·lê, for instance, as two pronunciations of the same character 了, even though liao^{3} and ·lê play very different parts in the language and may not even be etymologically the same word. The majority of variations of pronunciation for the same character belong to one of the following categories:

(1) Two or more pronunciations for the same character which are paralleled in other dialects. Thus 長 ch'ang^{2} "long"; chang^{3} "to grow," "elder"; or 乾 ch'ien^{2} "the male or positive principle"; kan^{1} "dry." Most of these variations have had a long history and can sometimes be traced to the time of the classics.

(2) Words with the entering tone in Ancient Chinese which ended in -k often have a literary and a colloquial pronunciation. They occur with the following finals:

Literary	-ê			-o		-u		-üeh
Colloquial	-ai	-ei	-ai	-ao	-ei	-iu	-ou	-iao
Example	色	賊	百	落	北	六	軸	角

The choice of such alternate forms depends sometimes upon the individual speaker, the mood, or the occasion, but especially upon the compound or phrase in which the syllable occurs. When position in a compound or phrase is the determining factor, the pronunciation is marked separately by respelling or by a cross sign against each entry, as for instance under No. 4122 落 lo^{4} and lao^{4} or No. 5445 色 sê^{4} and shai^{3}.

(3) "Empty" words or particles have a strong, or reading, pronunciation and a weak, or spoken, pronunciation. The most important cases are as follows:

Character	着 or 著	了	麼	呢	的	子
Strong form	cho^{1,2}, chao^{2}	liao^{3}	mo^{1,2}	ni^{1,2}	ti^{4,5}	tzŭ^{3}
Weak form	·chê, ·chih	·lê	·mê	·nê	·tê	·tzŭ

In the body of the dictionary, a dot before one of these characters indicates not only that the syllable is unstressed (see Section 8 below on the neutral tone), but that the weak form of pronunciation is to be used. In the few cases where the full vowel of the strong form has to go with the neutral tone, it is explicitly so marked, as No. 5064.9 碰·着 p'êng^{4}·chao, with the strong form, "to knock against," "to meet," as distinguished from 碰·着 p'êng^{4}·chih, with the weak form, "to be in contact."

5. Initials and Finals. — The most convenient way of analyzing a Chinese syllable is to divide it into (1) an initial, or the beginning sound, (2) a final, or the rest of the syllable, and (3) a tone, which may be regarded as a quality of the whole syllable. Thus, in the syllable nuan^{3} "warm," n- is the initial, -uan the final, and the figure 3 indicates that it has the third tone, or a low falling-rising circumflex tone. The initials and finals of Peiping as given in the Wade system, the Inland Mission system (as far as it corresponds to the Peiping dialect), the International Phonetic Alphabet, and the National Phonetic Alphabet are exhibited in Tables I and II.

Note 1. The initials ㄪ, ㄫ, and ㄬ in the old National Pronunciation, representing [v] [ŋ], and [ɲ] respectively, are abolished in the new standard. They are now replaced by w-, zero, and n- respectively.

Note 2. In the Wade system the variant forms tz, tz' and ss (or sz) are used only before the final -ŭ as a reminder of the buzzing quality of the final. Their sounds as initials here are identical with those represented by ts, ts', and s.

Note 3. No ambiguity results from the use of ch and ch' for two different pairs of sounds, as the retroflex initials never precede the palatal vowels -i- and -ü-, while the palatal initials always precede the palatal vowels. Note that the -ih in the Wade system in Table II is a retroflex vowel and is to be regarded as a digraph which has nothing to do with i. The ch in chih and the ch' in ch'ih have therefore the retroflex values.

Note 4. On the use of the initials y- and w-, see the second table of finals for the Wade system in Table II.

衣	鴉			噎	崖		要	幽	烟	音	央	英
烏	蛙	窩			歪	威			彎	溫	王	翁
迂				月					冤	氳		雍

In the Wade system, all syllables with finals beginning with i, u, or ü must be written with y, w, or yü if there is no other consonantal initial, as for instance wang, but hvang; and yen, but chien. The only exception is that the complete syllable i itself is written simply as i. The Inland Mission system does not use y or w at all.

Final h in -ih, -eh and the syllable êrh in the Wade system is to be considered as part of the whole notation, having no independent meaning of its own. In the Inland Mission system, however, a final h marks the entering tone. Thus the shih in Wade may be in any tone, being equivalent to Inland Mission shĭ, while shĭh in the latter system means shih or shĭ in the entering tone. In the National Phonetic Alphabet, these finals are not written; the signs for the initials ch, ch', sh, j, ts, ts', s, namely ㄓ，ㄔ，ㄕ，ㄖ，ㄗ，ㄘ，ㄙ, when not followed by any final, stand for complete syllables.

6. Syllabic Types. — Not every initial combines freely with every final. For example, the initials k, k', and h never combine with finals beginning with -i- or -ü-. Table III gives a complete picture of the types of syllables which actually occur in the Peiping dialect. Unless otherwise marked, each character in the table has the first initial of the group and is in the first tone. For example, 八 is pa^{1}. But 拜^{4} is pai^{4}, while 林^{l2} is lin^{2}.

Note (a). A peculiar feature of the Wade system is that cho, ch'o, jo and shuo form a series. In actual pronunciation, there is a trace of the semi-vowel -u- in all these syllables The National Phonetic spelling writes the semi-vowel in for all cases, the Inland Mission system omits it in all cases. We shall observe the contrast between cho, ch'o, and jo on the one hand and shuo on the other as a purely graphic convention of the Wade system.

Note (b). 這 is often pronounced chei^{4} < chê^{4}-i^{1} 'this one,' though no longer limited to reference to one individual in present usage.

Note (c). The actual pronunciation of the syllables spelt ko, k'o, ho, o is kê, k'ê, hê, ê, that is, with an unrounded mid-back vowel. (Cf. Section 2 above.)

Note (d). P'ia^{1} is an onomatopoetic word without a character, representing the sound of a slap or a splash.

Note (e). When the initial is y-, the syllables are written thus: i, ya, yeh, yai, yao, yu, yen, yin, yang, ying. (See Table II.)

Note (f). This final is written -ui after the t-group, the ts-group, and the ch-group of initials and after the initial h- of the k-group, but written -uei after the initials k- and k'-. In actual pronunciation, the prominence of the -e- element is even more influenced by the tone than by the kind of initials which precede it. In general, the third and fourth tones are associated with the more open value of the final, while the first two tones are associated with the more close value. The same is true of the final -iu for which the actual pronunciation in the third and fourth tones is actually -iou. It should be noted however that even in the first two tones, -ui (灰) never rimes with -i (雞) and -iu (流) never rimes with -u (胡), which shows that some trace of a mid vowel between the i and the u, in whichever order, is never completely absent. The same is true, though to a lesser extent, of the final -un.

Note (g). Of the t-series of initials, only t- and t'- combine with -ui. The initials n- and l- combine with -ei but not with -ui.

Note (h). When the initial is w-, the syllables are written thus: wu, wa, wo, wai, wei (not wui), wan, wên (not wun), wang, wêng (not wung). (See Table II.)

Note (i). There is usually a slight rounding in the semi-vowel, but it is written -i- in the Wade system.

Note (j). When the initial is a (rounded) y-, the syllables are written thus: yü, yüeh, yüan, yün, yung. (See Table II.)

7. Tones. — A Chinese syllable, as we saw, consists of not only an initial and a final, but also a tone, or the time-pitch function during the whole voiced part of the syllable. Thus, lang^{2}, with a high rising tone, 'wolf,' and lang^{4}, with a falling tone, 'wave,' are as different from each other to the Chinese speaker as long and wrong or as long and lung are to an English-speaking person. The unsophisticated Chinese speaker, whose writing consists of characters for whole syllables, certainly does not find the conception of consonant and vowel any less elusive and intangible than the conception of tone. The task of the foreign student of Chinese, on the other hand, should be to realize that the constituent of tone is just as essential as those of consonant and vowel in forming Chinese words.

The dialect of Peiping has four tones in stressed syllables, the pronunciation of an isolated character being always considered as stressed. If the average range of speaking pitch is divided into four equal intervals marked by five points: 1 low, 2 half-low, 3 middle, 4 half-high, and 5 high, all tones can be sufficiently identified by naming its starting and ending pitch, and, in the case of circumflex tones, the turning point. The four tones of the Peiping dialect, together with their traditional names, can then be described as follows:

No.	Chinese Name		English Name	Description	Pitch
1	陰平(聲)	yin^{1}-p'ing^{2} (shêng^{1})	Upper Even (Tone)	High level	55:
2	陽平(聲)	yang^{2}-p'ing^{2} (shêng^{1})	Lower Even (Tone)	High rising	35:
3	上聲	shang^{3}-shêng^{1}	Rising Tone	Low rising	214:
4	去聲	ch'ü^{4}-shêng^{1}	Falling, or Going, Tone	High falling to low	51:

Both the absolute pitch and the relative pitch, or range, of the tones depend upon the sex, the individual voice, and the mood of the speaker. The average interval for each step is between a whole tone and a tone and a half, so that the total range is somewhere between an augmented fifth and an octave. It goes without saying that in Chinese, as in any non-tonal language, the pitch of the speaking voice glides portamento fashion instead of jumping from one pitch to another discontinuously. Thus, no resemblance to the Chinese tones could be got by playing any sequence of notes on a keyed instrument. It should be noted that the usual figures for tones refer to the classes, as indicated in the first column of the preceding table, and have nothing to do with the five levels of pitch.

In the old National Pronunciation of 1920, as well as in the Inland Mission system, both of which take features of Central dialects into consideration, a fifth tone ju^{4}-shêng^{1} 入聲 or 'entering tone' is recognized. Words in this tone are derived from those ending in -p, -t, and -k in Ancient Chinese, and are now pronounced with a short vowel, ending in a glottal stop when it is at the end of a phrase, as in Nanking, or simply form a separate tone class without being either short or ending in a glottal stop. as in Changsha.

In this dictionary, words in the fifth tone are grouped separately after those in the other tones. They are marked by the figure 5 and the Inland Mission system of romanization has a final -h to mark this tone. For example, in the form Chïh in parentheses at the head of No. 988, p. 173, col. I the -h indicates that all characters in this group from No. 988 to No. 1013 belong to the entering tone class. As noted above, it has nothing to do with the last -h in the syllable chih of the Wade system, in which -ih is simply the conventional digraph to represent the r-like retroflex vowel, which is written ï in the Inland Mission system.

Since the entering tone does not exist in the Peiping dialect, which is the present standard, practically all characters marked with a figure 5 are also marked with one of the first four figures according to the present Peiping pronunciation, as for example No. 267, p. 32, col. II 折$^{2\cdot5}$. The only exceptions are a small number of rare characters, or rare alternate pronunciations of common characters, for which there is no usage to follow in either reading or speaking in Peiping. A native scholar on being asked about any of these cases would probably turn to a dictionary, and finding that the fan-ch'ieh form of spelling had the entering tone, would give a fourth tone, or some other tone by whatever analogy might suggest itself to him at the moment, so that such "modern" pronunciations would be highly artificial and would represent no fact concerning the dialect or the usage of literary reading. Such cases have therefore been left as 5's without being marked with an additional Peiping tone-mark.

7. Tone-Sandhi. — In most Chinese dialects, the tones of syllables spoken in succession are different from those of the same syllables when spoken in isolation. This difference is called tone-sandhi. The tone-sandhi in Peiping is one of the simplest among the dialects. The rules are as follows:

(1) A third tone followed by any tone except another third tone is pronounced without its final rising pitch. This is sometimes called the half-third tone. Examples are:

3+1	好天	hao^3 t'ien^1	'good weather'
3+2	好人	hao^3 jên^2	'good man'
3+4	好話	hao^3 hua^4	'good words'
3+neutral	好罷	hao^3 ·pa	'good! all right!'

In each case, the tone of hao^{3}, which has the pitch pattern of '214' when spoken alone or at the end of a phrase, now has the pitch pattern of '21,' in other words, it stays low without any rise.

(2) A third tone followed by another third tone changes into the second tone, as:

3+3 → 2+3	好酒	hao$^{\underline{3}}$ chiu^3	'good wine'

where $^{\underline{3}}$ marks the third-tone syllable pronounced in the second tone when followed by another third tone.

Once understood to be automatic, neither of these changes need be marked in the body of the dictionary. There is however one exception. When the second syllable in the third tone has the unstressed or neutral tone, to be explained below, the case comes under (2) or (1) according to whether the speaker treats it as a third-tone syllable or not. If it is treated as quite unstressed and quite neutral, then only the neutral-tone mark '·' is used. Thus the compound 椅·子 i^{3}·tzŭ has a half-third tone, followed by a half-high neutral tone. If however the second syllable is still treated as a third tone, the first syllable changes into the second even though the second syllable is actually pronounced unstressed, as for example in No. 2605.41 小$^{\underline{3}}$·姐 hsiao$^{\underline{3}}$·chieh, where the underscored '$^{\underline{3}}$' stands for the second tone which comes from an original third.

8. The Neutral Tone. — From the standpoint of single characters, practically every character pronounced alone has one of the four regular tones. But in compounds and connected speech, a syllable is often unstressed and loses its characteristic tone, and its pitch is determined, not by its original tone, but by its tonal environment, chiefly by the tone of the preceding syllable. An unstressed syllable is said to be atonic and its tone may be called the neutral tone.

The notation for the neutral tone is a dot or a circle before the character (or the romanization for the syllable) according as the neutral tone is compulsory or optional. When the presence or absence of the neutral tone makes a difference in the meaning, then the dotted and undotted entries are written separately before their respective meanings, as for example in No. 996-A.1 執事 'to arrange'; 'deacons'; but 執·事 'official insignia.' Again, in No. 6180.6, 心疼 'pained at heart'; but 心·疼 'to love,' etc.

The pitch of the neutral tone is as follows:

Half-low	after tone 1	高·的	kao^{1}·tê	'high ones'
Half-low (or half-high in more lively speech)	after tone 2	長·的	ch'ang^{2}·tê	'long ones'
Half-high	after tone 3	短·的	tuan^{3}·tê	'short ones'
Low	after tone 4	大·的	ta^{4}·tê	'big ones'

In the relatively infrequent case when the neutral tone begins a phrase, its pitch is usually half-low.

While the preceding paragraphs give all the necessary practical information as to how the neutral tone is pronounced, it is a much more complicated problem to know when the neutral tone is used. On the whole, neutral tones may be divided into grammatical cases and lexical cases, though they often shade into each other. Particles, interjections, pronouns after verbs, and other "empty words" which do not carry important concrete meanings in a sentence have the neutral tone Except for particles, these are mostly optional cases of the neutral tone (those which are marked with circles). What is most important in this dictionary is the recording of thousands of compounds containing the neutral tone as individual lexical facts, just as facts of the stress-accent in English have to be recorded individually in dictionaries and cannot be covered by rules. From the point of view of grammatical analysis, it is possible to account for a large proportion of neutral-tone syllables by recognizing them as suffixes, as ·子 --·tzŭ (noun suffix), ·見 --·chien (suffix for successful perception), ·處 --·ch'u (suffix for respect or quality), ·來 --·lai (suffix for motion or change towards the speaker, like German her-), etc., etc. But from the point of view of the user of the dictionary, who is confronted with a text in characters, he may not be able to decide whether a given character is a suffix or a full word, since frequently the same character is used in both ways. Hence the necessity of marking these suffixes with the neutral-tone sign in each case. For example, 老子^3 the philosopher Lao-tzŭ, but 老·子 popular term for 'father,' 'the old man.'

When the full tone and the neutral tone are associated with different pronunciations, the tone sign or dot is to imply that the pronunciation is the one which is associated with it. For example, since 了 has two pronunciations liao^{3} and ·lê, writing 了^3 or ·了 will be sufficient notation to indicate which pronunciation is to be used. (In a similar way, the '2' in 長^2 implies that it is ch'ang^{2} and the '3' in 長^3 implies that it is chang^{3}.)

The majority of occurrences of the neutral tone are the purely lexical cases, which have to be recorded as individual facts. It may be said that, on the whole, literary expressions, new terms, and technical terms do not contain the neutral tone, as 失敬；僞裝；電子^{3}. There remain then the colloquial compounds of old standing, of which some contain the neutral tone and some do not. It is among compounds of this type that it is most essential to distinguish those which contain the neutral tone from those which do not. Sometimes, the presence of the neutral tone serves as an indication as to which one of several synonymous compounds is the most commonly used or has the oldest standing. For example, in No. 2434.21 喜·歡 has at least 1,000 times the frequency of 喜悅, though the latter is by no means obsolete. Similarly, in No. 3697.97, 工·錢 is the usual term for 'wages,' for which 工銀, 工値, and 工價 under the same heading are much less frequent synonyms.

In very formal reading of a literary text, there is no neutral tone, every syllable receiving its full etymological tone. For this reason, we shall simplify the marking of the neutral tone by adopting the following conventions: (1) The literary particles like 之, 乎, 矣, 也, etc. are never marked with a dot, it being understood that in actual reading one can give it the neutral tone according to the rhythm and mood. (2) All syllables marked with a dot are in the neutral tone in normal speech, but when read formally or read for dictation, they may all acquire full tones. The meaning of the dot as indicating "compulsory" neutral tone is that it is compulsory only in normal (deliberate) speech, and not in formalized reading.

Due to alternation of rhythm, three-syllable combinations in which there is no neutral tone usually have their second syllable slightly less prominent than the other two, and four-syllable combinations containing no neutral tone have their second and third syllables slightly less stressed. Once understood, such modifications are not marked in the dictionary.

9. The Retroflex Vowels. — An extreme case of the neutral tone is the diminutive suffix derived from 兒 êrh^{2} 'child.' It is so weakened as to become either a consonantal ending -r added after the syllable or a simultaneous retroflexing modification of the preceding vowel. In either case, there is no addition of an extra syllable, though in a character text it is written with 兒 as a separate character. The pronunciation of this ending varies after various types of finals. After high vowels, except the complete final -u, i.e., after -ŭ, -ih, -i, and -ü, and after -eh, it becomes -êr. (In all cases, the vowel in the third and fourth tones is more open, approaching -ar.) Examples are 子兒^{3} tsêr^{3}, 枝兒 chêr^{1}, 梨兒 liêr^{2}, 魚兒 yüêr^{2}, from tzŭ^{3}, chih^{1}, li^{2}, yü^{2}. After -u, -a, -o, -ê, -ao, -ou, there is no change in the final except the addition of an ending -r or simultaneous retroflexion in the articulation of the preceding vowel. After finals ending in -i or in -n, the -i and -n are dropped entirely (with -ien becoming -iar instead of -iêr or ier), as 塊 k'uai^{4}, 一塊兒 i^{2}-k'uar^{4}; 今 chin^{1}, 今兒 chiêr^{1}; 點 tien^{3}, 一點兒 i^{4}-tiar^{3}. After finals ending in -ng, the whole vowel becomes simultaneously nasalized and retroflexed. For example, while the character 繩 is pronounced shêng^{2}, with three sounds sh-ê-ng, the compound 繩兒 is pronounced shêng'r^{2}, with only two sounds, the simple consonant sh, and the nasalized retroflex vowel written here as êng'r or [ɜ̃ʴ] in phonetic notation.

Besides representing the non-syllabic diminutive suffix, the character 兒 also represents the stressed form êrh^{2} and the unstressed form ·êrh, both being syllabic and meaning 'child,' as 兒女 êrh^{2}-nü^{3} 'sons and daughters'; 女·兒 nü^{3}·êrh 'daughter.' To simplify our notation, these two types are marked as above, while the non-syllabic suffix 兒 or -r is left unmarked, as it is by far the most frequent in this dictionary. Compounds ending in an unmarked 兒 should therefore be pronounced according to the description given in the preceding paragraph.

For reasons of space, addition of the non-syllabic 兒 introduced in the new edition is often indicated by the insertion at the lower right-hand corner of the preceding character the National Phonetic letter ㄦ, as in No. 4303.15 麻花$_{ㄦ}$.

LIST OF SYLLABIC HEADINGS

Owing to the numerous revisions of pronunciation, the original order of entries, which was not strictly alphabetic to start with, departs still further from alphabetic order. The following table will serve to help locate the syllables as well as exhibit a bird's-eye view of all the syllables. Letters in italics represent headings which are out of the alphabetic order; those in brackets are headings which were omitted in the dictionary but which should have been included according to the original system.

THE STRUCTURE OF CHINESE CHARACTERS.*

1. A Chinese character, which is not itself a Radical, consists of two parts: the Radical and the Phonetic, or when it does not give the sound of the character, the Primitive. The Radical is one from the list of 214 Radicals, the Phonetic is the other half of the character, and strange to say, the Chinese language contains no name for it.[1] It is sometimes itself another Radical, as in 近 記 理 罵, but more frequently a compound character formed of another Radical and Phonetic, as in 語 造 羅.

Speaking very generally, for the rule is frequently broken, it would seem as if Chinese characters were constructed on the following principle:—The Radical should give a clue to the meaning of a character, the Phonetic a clue to its sound. Thus 油 yu, oil, comes from 由 yu as phonetic, and the water radical indicating a liquid; 神 shen, god or spirit, from 申 shen, as phonetic, and the omen radical; 駕 chia, to ride, from 加 chia, as phonetic, and the horse radical; 議 i, to discuss, from 義 i, as phonetic, and the words radical.

The beginner will often find a new character to be an old radical with a new phonetic, or sometimes merely a new combination of a familiar radical with a familiar phonetic.

2. A good deal of difficulty will be found at first, in knowing under what radical to look for any particular character, and unfortunately some of the commonest characters are the hardest to find. However, no one need be discouraged, for a few months' steady practice will work wonders in removing the difficulties.

The radical may occupy any part of the character. It may be at the top, as 竹 in 管; or at the bottom, as 皿 in 監; on the left, as 糸 in 給; on the right, as 阝 in 都; surrounding it, as 口 in 固; or in the middle of it, as 口 in 周; partially surrounding it, as 疒 in 痕, or 辵 in 退, or 門 in 間; or the radical may be split in two, enclosing the phonetic, as 行 in 衙, or 衣 in 裏, or 二 in 五. Sometimes it is mixed up in a general sort of way with the phonetic, as 冂 in 再, or 大 in 奉, or 禾 in 穀, or 口 in 嘗.

3. a. Consider whether the character is a radical itself. Thus 音 香 高 辛 至 面 行 黑 麻 走 玉 色 are themselves radicals.

b. If the character is not a radical, the first step is to break it into two parts. In two cases out of three there will be one part on the right hand and another on the left; in which case it is easy to break the character up. Thus:— 初 就 物 創 的 沒 樣 暗 卻 認 呌 他 作. Or the division may be horizontal, one half being above, the other beneath, and in this case the division is not quite so simple; as, 界 意 告 督 覆 答 萬 負 罪 要 靈 拏. Or one half may enclose the other on two or more sides, as 有 道 同 在 造 反 底 間 因. There are in addition other forms which are harder to divide.

c. If one of the two parts is a radical and the other is not, obviously we must look for it under that part which is a radical; as for instance, 的 釘 福 雖 忽 花, which come from 白 金 示 隹 心 艹, respectively, the other halves not being radicals.

d. Where both halves of a character are radicals, the following rules must be applied:—

1. Where the character consists of a right-hand and a left-hand half, THE LEFT-HAND HALF is usually the radical; as, for instance, 信 加 塊 如 律 性 拉 明 根. Each of these examples consists of two radicals; but the one on the LEFT HAND is that under which one must look for it.

[[1] Called 右文 'the right-hand side character.' Popularly a.c. 偏旁, a term also applied to the radical.]

Exceptions:—The radicals 刀 力 文 斤 殳 彡 欠 阝 (163) [阝 170 is regular] 隹 鳥, are generally found on the right side of the character, but in these cases the left side is seldom a radical.

The rule that the LEFT-HAND portion of the character is the radical also holds in cases where the radical extends to two or more sides of the character. For instance:— 庫 尼 建 房 虎 赴 連 間.

2. Where the character consists of an upper and lower half, both being radicals, the LOWER HALF is usually the radical. As, for instance: 思 昏 果 泉 兄 冬 分 妾.

Exceptions:—The following radicals are placed at the top of the character:— 艹 ⺮ [two very large groups] 亠 宀 穴 罒 雨 爫.

These rules will dispose of nineteen-twentieths of the characters in Chinese; though, alas! many exceptions will be found to them, such as 相 from 目 instead of 木; 妝 from 女 instead of 爿; 取 from 又 instead of 耳; 和 from 口 instead of 禾; but it will often be found that the meaning gives a reason why the rule was broken.

A balance remains of eccentric characters for which no rules can be made. For example 賸 from 貝; 歸 from 止; 與 from 臼; 聚 from 耳; 望 from 月; 直 from 目; and many others, for which see Lists of Difficult Characters in dictionaries.
